3 THINGS

ABOUT MEAT

The World Health Organization says meat production is projected to rise to 376 million metric tons by 2030 from 218 million metric tons annually in 1997-1999, and demand from a growing world population is expected to rise beyond that.

The meat industry contributes about

18 percent

of global greenhouse gas emissions, a proportion expected to grow as consumers in fast-developing countries such as China and India eat more meat, the report said. REUTERS

According to a 2006 report by the U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization, industrialized agriculture contributes on a "massive scale" to climate change, air pollution, land degradation, energy use, deforestation and biodiversity decline.

TEST TUBE BURGER TASTES KIND OF LIKE MEAT

Reuters

LONDON The world's first laboratory-grown beef burger was flipped out of a petri dish and into a frying pan Monday, with food tasters declaring it tasted "close to meat."

Grown in-vitro from cattle stem cells at a cost of $332,000, the burger was cooked and eaten in front of TV cameras to gain the greatest media coverage for the culmination of a five-year science experiment.

Resembling a standard circularshaped red meat patty, it was created by knitting together 20,000 strands of laboratory-grown protein, combined with other ingredients normally used in burgers, such as salt, breadcrumbs and egg powder. Red beet juice and saffron were added to give it color.

The two food tasters were reserved in their judgement, perhaps anxious not to offend their host at the London event, noting the burger's "absence of fat."

Pressed for a more detailed description of the flavor, food writer Josh Schonwald said the cultured beef had an "animal protein cake"-like quality to it, adding that he would like to try it with some of the extras often served with traditional burgers—salt, pepper, ketchup and jalepenos.

Even the scientist behind the burger's creation, vascular biologist Mark Post of Maastricht University in the Netherlands, was relatively muted in his praise of its flavour.

"It's a very good start," he told the hundreds of reporters who had gathered to watch the meat being cooked and served.

The Dutch scientist's aim was to show the world that in the future meat will not necessarily have to come from the environmentally and economically costly rearing and slaughtering of millions of animals.

*Current meat production is at its maximum—we need to come up with an alternative," he said.

CTA: Ventra card has good first day

GOING PUBLIC Tracy Swartz

The CTA gave itself a good grade on the first day of Ventra, its new fare payment system.

Students at two local colleges and CTA employees on Monday were officially the first to try Ventra, where users can tap their passes on card readers. Other riders are being phased in to the system, which will replace Chicago Cards and the paper magnetic stripe cards. Sept. 9 is the start date for all CTA riders.

The CTA said things went smoothly Monday for its employees and U-Pass student fare users at Westwood College in the Loop and Rush Medical College on the Near West Side. These schools got first crack at the system because of their class start dates.

"Anecdotally from the field, everything went fine," CTA spokeswoman Tammy Chase said. "No issues reported."

Natasha Russell, director of student support at Westwood, said she had Ventra cards ready for nearly 280 students who were recently enrolled in the college.

Some 100-plus students who are new to campus or had taken some time off signed up for the card and were given free seven-day unlimited cards while their Ventra cards were being processed.

Orientation Monday at Westwood included information about how to use Ventra, Russell said

"I think the confusion about the program was minimal." Russell said. "I've had one student call and they used the card, and they got the green light to go."

Russell said her school has been preparing for more than six months for the transition to Ventra. The CTA said it continues to test the card for glitches.

A weekly dispatch from a CTA station of note

This week: Cicero Blue Line

The CTA announced in June that it is undergoing a $1 million study of how to improve the Forest Park branch of the Blue Line, including this stop in Austin. One of the priorities undoubtedly should be to fix the track of this section of the Blue Line, which was under 28 percent slow zone in July including just west of the Cicero stop. Aesthetics also should be considered. The Blue Line stations along the Eisenhower Expressway are dank concrete jungles. Not many have pedestrian-friendly layouts for easy transfer to and from buses. Landscaping alone would go a long way toward making these Blue Line stops seem less sad.

Despite challenges, small organizations fight violence on their terms

By Mick Swasko | REDEYE

Michael Dye and Justin Harris arrived at Stroger Hospital before the ambulance carrying their friend did.

Just after 1: p.m. May 7, Dye came upon the Grand Green Line station and heard shots ring out. His friend, Kevin Ambrose, had been shot in the back. Dye rushed to his side as Ambrose collapsed in an alley.

"I could see him lying there," Dye said. "He was still alive when I got down there, but you could see the pain in his eyes."

Dye said he has trouble recalling the emotions of the evening, but fear, shock, anger and sadness all took their turns after Ambrose-a 19-year-old theater student who lived just minutes from the Green Line stop in Grand Boulevardwas pronounced dead later that night.

It stuck with Dye, 19, of South Shore and Harris, 19, of Greater Grand Crossing, that it took so long for for an ambulance to arrive at Stroger Hospital. The pair and friend Zan Adams, 18, of Bronzeville, wonder whether Ambrose could have been saved if the South Side had another trauma center that could handle gunshot wounds. (A spokesperson for Stroger Hospital said the hospital cannot comment on specific cases, but that it is not in control of ambulance response times and is fully equipped to handle any trauma case that comes through its doors.)

SMALL GROUPS, BIG VOICES

They might not be big, but that doesn't mean they're not making a difference. RedEye spoke with three small Chicago antiviolence underdogs fighting for their communities.

After the shooting, Dye, Harris and Adams co-founded RISEChicago, a grassroots organization that aims to bring another trauma center to the South Side and call attention to the rising toll of homicides in Chicago. Next year, they plan to place orange markers in each Chicago neighborhood, tallying the number of killings in each area.

"This is happening all around us, all the time,* Adams said. "People read about people getting killed. But if you could see, all at one time, all the murders, it would have an effect on people's minds and psyche."

RISE exists in a complex ecosystem of groups large and small, official and unofficial, working to combat violence in Chicago. With shoestring budgets and small staffs, such organizations are underdogs facing the daily toll of violence in the city. These organizations, by their nature, are difficult to quantify, and many organizations working for similar causes simply don't know all the others that exist.

Rebecca Levin is looking to change that.

"It's something we're struggling with mightily." Levin, the director of Strengthening Chicago's Youth (SCY), a program aimed at connecting small anti-violence organizations. As the liaison to community organizations throughout Chicago, Levin has a list of more than 400 individuals in 160 organizations, a list that's hardly comprehensive when it comes to tallying all anti-violence efforts. The program is a part of the Anne and Robert H. Lurie Children's Hospital.

"All of these small organizations working together is what's really going to move the dial,* she said. The challenge is that there is no central governing body, registry or database for these organizations. Some choose to register as nonprofit organizations, but it's not something that happens overnight, she says.

Levin cites the after-school program Kids off the Block as an example. It began in 2003 with one woman opening her home to students in Roseland after school in hopes of keeping them off the street. Now, the program has aided more than 1,500 youths with after-school programs and has won national recognition.

Though they may fly under the radar, being the underdog can have its advantages. The Resident Association of Greater Englewood (RAGE) works to serve a part of Englewood that often gets overlooked by other groups: the working- and middle-class families in the neighborhood. Formed in 2010, RAGE is not designated as a nonprofit, and it does not seek funding through grant programs offered by the city and state. The group's founder, Asiaha Butler, said she would prefer to keep it that way.

"A lot of these [larger] groups get pigeonholed; they get away from the real reason they are doing the work," she said. "We want to say whatever we want to say, call out an alderman, be independent enough to do what we want to do. Sometimes it's a hindrance and sometimes it is an advantage."

Butler said not being restrained by official designations or the regulations of grant money helps the group maintain its mission.

"No one focuses on the residents that aren't poor and uneducated," she said. "It's something I call the Englewood victim syndrome. Since so many bad things happen in the community; people think these things are normal, they are going to happen. [RAGE] definitely doesn't feel like bad things are supposed to happen to us."

Facing mounting violence in Chicago with a minimal budget does take its toll on some organizations. With a group of about to volunteers, Speaking Publicly Eliminates Another Killing (SPEAK), aims to go global with its message of speaking out against violence and breaking pre-established beliefs about "snitching" when violence occurs. But funding is what Keisha Willis says has sometimes hindered the efforts of her organization. She's run domestic, gang and bullying violence workshops in 10 Chicago-area schools since 2011, but applications for grants and donations are hard to come by, with more established organizations instead getting

"I have so many ideas, my imagination is so huge, that funding is the issue," she said. "There are so many people out there vying for the same piece of pie. But give me a slice, and I will make sure we have more pie."

RISEChicago said it will keep pushing for the South Side trauma center, despite setbacks.

"When it comes to power and pull, we don't have that," Adams said. "What we do have is the power of people. Everyone in Chicago knows somebody that's been affected by gun violence. That's not good. They have the money and the power; we have the power of people. We're underdogs for now, but eventually we will have so many people they can't turn us away."

No men on the crew for this historical ship

Chicago Tribune

In 1999, Dawn Parker Santamaria and her husband purchased a 66-year-old, 110-foot topsail schooner they rechristened under its original name, "Unicorn."

It was his dream to buy the boat, but Parker Santamaria soon came to believe it was her destiny to take over the ship and give what she called his "little hobby" a new mission: empowering teenage girls.

On Wednesday, when the Unicorn sails into town for the Tall Ships Chicago 2013 festival at Navy Pier, Parker Santamaria will be standing at the helm of what she says is the only historical tall ship with an all-female crew. Among its members will be several teenage girls taking part in the nonprofit program that Parker Santamaria founded in 2005, Sisters Under Sail.

Every one to two weeks throughout the summer, six girls board the Unicorn for a crash course in sailing through the St. Lawrence Seaway and Great Lakes. Thrust into an unfamiliar setting and removed from peer pressure and other expectations, they discover their abilities as leaders.

Parker Santamaria said the program has its roots in her own youth in Naperville, when she was a less-than-confident teenager.

She initially thought the Unicorn would be her husband's toy while she focused on raising their four daughters. But when she saw how helping out as deckhands made her daughters appreciate responsibility and teamwork, she realized that teaching girls confidence and leadership was a calling. The ship became a vehicle for her newfound pursuit.

"There's something magical about boarding a ship, and seeing the girls leave the first dock not even knowing the different parts of the ship or what a dock line is called, and when we reach our destination they're throwing up sails and trusting themselves to do it right because BOSTON Prosecutors on Monday told jurors that James "Whitey" Bulger was the "vicious, violent and calculating" Boston mob boss his former gang mates had described at his and murder racketeering trial, while defense attorneys urged jurors not to trust career criminals who had cut plea deals.

Each side's closing statement focused on testimony of three former members of Bulger's "Winter Hill" gang who described 10 murders the defendant was charged with committing or ordering in the 1970s and Bos.

"The evidence in this trial has convincingly proven that the defendant was one of the most vicious, violent and calculating criminals to ever walk the streets of Boston," assistant U.S. attorney Fred Wyshak said.

Bulger, 83, has pleaded not guilty to all criminal counts and the jury is expected to begin deliberating Tuesday.

Wyshak recounted the testimony of three top Bulger allies who said Bulger ordered or himself carried out murders of gangland rivals, suspected informants and two women. They also testified Bulger's gang shook down both fellow criminals and local business owners.

Bull runs coming to U.S.

About 1,000 people have signed up to sprint alongside a stampede of bulls when a U.S. version of the famous Spanish tradition comes to the Chicago area in July.

The Great Bull Run, modeled after the festival that takes place each year in Pamplona, Spain, will hold its inaugural run in Richmond, Va., next month and will hit at least eight other cities before arriving at Hawthorne Race Course in Stickney on July Organizer Bradford Scudder decided to create the U.S.-based event to give thrillseekers a chance to run with bulls without having to spend the time and money to fly to Spain.

For a fee starting at $35, participants can enjoy a bull run followed by a rotten tomato fight, another Spanish tradition.

The Great Bull Run website warns participants that the race is "the real deal," and that participants "accept the risk that you might be trampled, gored, rammed or tossed in the air by a bull." Participants must pay an insurance fee, and medical staff will be at the site.

To minimize risk, organizers said they will use less aggressive bulls than the ones that run in Spain. Animal rights advocates have called on the USDA to investigate whether the organizers are properly licensed.

"These events are a shameful example of cruelty for the sake of nothing more than entertainment and profit," said Ann Chynoweth, senior director of The Humane Society of the United States' End Animal Cruelty and Fighting campaign.

A-ROD BRINGS THE CIRCUS TO CHICAGO AS MLB ISSUES SUSPENSIONS

Chicago Tribune

The topic of the White Sox's 10-game losing streak was on the back burner Monday at U.S. Cellular Field as the Sox readied to play the Yankees and newly suspended Alex Rodriguez. A mass of local and national media descended upon the South Side to talk about Rodriguez's return to the Yankees lineup the same day he was suspended by Major League Baseball through 2014 for his involvement in the scandal surrounding Biogenesis, a now-closed Miami clinic that was a source for illegal performance-enhancing drugs. Many of the White Sox, who were not among those affected by the 13 player suspensions, said they had other worries than the hoopla that surrounded the announcement and the Chicago appearance of Rodriguez. "You've seen this team play recently. I've got 99 problems and A-Rod ain't one of them," Sox general manager Rick Hahn said. For the record, A-Rod went 1-for-4 with a strikeout Monday in the Yankees' 8-1 loss to open the three-game series. Here are some other numbers A-Rod and his baseball buddies might keep an eye on.

GOLDEN DOME

According to the Adidas Facebook page, Notre Dame will wear special unis for its Oct. 5 game against Arizona State. They will be 'all-white with metallic gold and kelly green shamrock accents." That includes gold helmets, gold jersey numbers, and gold shamrocks on the shoulders. Players will wear a skintight kelly green base layer with "Fightin' Irish" written across the chest and the school's interlocking ND logo stamped on both biceps in the same metallic gold. Subtle.

Crowded at the top

First-round draft pick Kyle Long might have to wait a few downs before starting his NFL career. The Bears rockie was listed as a co-starter at right guard—along with Chicago native James Brown—when the team released its first depth chart of the preseason.

Fitch snitch

A prominent autograph broker on eBay claims that Johnny Manziel's friend and personal assistant, Nate Fitch, told him Manziel would no longer sign autographs for him without compensation, according to ESPN. The broker said the Texas A&M quarterback signed about 250 items for him last November, but he did not pay Manziel. The broker also claimed Fitch said he could provide other college football players to sign autographs, but would have to be compensated.

THE MOUTHWATCH

I watched him out there today catching the ball. Certainly what we see is clear, we see a big

 Bears coach Marc Trestman, on newly signed tight end Leonard Pope

THE FINISH LINE

Ahh, the magic of satellite feeds.

» The Cubs claimed outfielder Thomas Neal off waivers from the New York Yankees. » Green Bay to try out QB Vince Young, a former first-round pick, USA Today reports

It's common wisdom in the entertainment business that women will happily consume and enjoy fictions about both men and women, but that most men enjoy only fictions about other men. Having recently finished watching and loving Netflix's new series "Orange is the New Black," about life inside a minimum security women's prison, it occurred to me that this may be the first time in my memory that TV has offered women so many high-quality shows about other women. Here's a selection of current shows and their female characters to love-or love to hate. REDEVE CONTRIBUTED

Emma Watson faced acting 'paralysis' after 'Potter'

Los Angeles Times

You may have noticed that "Harry Potter" star Emma Watson has taken un-Hermione Granger-like roles as of late.

That's after the 23-year-old stopped acting altogether for a bit and briefly enrolled at Brown University in 2009, then dropped out before completing a degree. Post-"Potter," Watson, who skyrocketed to fame in the big-screen adaptations of J.K. Rowling's series, took on a small role in "My Week With Marilyn" in 2011, fully returned to acting in "The Perks of Being a Wallflower" and made serious fun of herself in the self-deprecating raunch-com "This is the End."

But Watson said she, and even her agent, were "surprised" by her return to acting after the juggernaut that was "Harry Potter" and the eight feature films.

"I was really unsure, but then I read the script for 'The Perks of Being a Wallflower,' and falling in love with that and then having such a great experience on that movie kind of sealed the deal for me," Watson told Entertainment Weekly.

"I stopped intellectualizing it, and it became much more instinctual. I just got the bug and got very driven all of a sudden, which I really wasn't before."

So she's saying she really wasn't all that driven during "Harry Potter's" decadelong run? Muggle hearts are breaking evervwhere.

Part of the struggle stemmed from being pushed into Hermione-esque roles and the media wondering if she was capable of acting outside that

"For a while I kind of bought into the hype of, 'Will they ever be able to play anything else?' It gave me a sense of paralysis and stage fright for a while," she said. "And then a professor told me that they didn't think I should act, either. So I was really grappling with it and wasn't feeling good about it. And then, I don't know ... it got so bad and people had put me in a box so much that it started pissing me off. I suddenly wanted to prove them wrong."

That could explain why she took the role of Nicki in Sofia Coppola's teen heist film, "The Bling Ring."

> "Really, I was open-minded about doing anything, but the one thing I didn't want to do was get myself into a corset because I was worried I'd never get out again," she said in the May 2013 issue of GQ.

> "I wanted to make a conscious adult decision that this was what I wanted to pursue, because that decision was made for me as a 9-year-old," she added. "... So I wanted to step away and make sure this is what I wanted to pour my life and my energy and my blood, sweat and tears into."

The Deen's list

Can you spot the 'Canyons' star's actual porn titles?

By Dana Moran | REDEYE

Did you watch "The Canyons" this weekend? Probably not—it tanked big time, making only $15,200 on one screen in New York according to boxofficemojo.com. But the Lindsay Lohan/James Deen erotic thriller also was released Friday on demand, which means there's plenty of time to make up some amazing drinking games. To get you started, here's one of our own: Can you spot the titles of actual porns Deen has starred in from among the titles listed? (He has been in more than 1,000, and yes, we had a tough time picking the clean-ish ones for print.)

No, Mumford and Sons wasn't trying to pull a fast one on you: That was actually them playing at Lollapalooza on Saturday. But in their new video for "Hopeless Wanderer," the band finds themselves being replaced by some pretty sketchy doppelgangers: Jason Sudeikis, Ed Helms, Jason Bateman and Will Forte. How much do the funnymen really look like their Mumford counterparts? We took to the video—which, by the way, is hysterical—to find out.

MEETTHEFOLKS

Wait, that's not Mumford and Sons!

ORISIT...

Jason Sudeikis --- Marcus Mumford

Honestly, the most important part of this impression is the earring, which we hope Jason actually got for realsies and didn't just use a paper clip like we did in elementary school. But these pictures actually make us want to see Marcus do a Jason impression.

Jason Bateman → Winston Marshall

First off, Winston has a fully robust and impressive neckbeard, and looks like he may moonlight as Teen Wolf. Try as he might, Jason is a little too wrinkled around the eyes to trick anyone into thinking he's a teen—MAYBE a really mature grad student. But his banjo handling really is superb.

Ed Helms >→ Ben Lovett

Ed, I am sorry, sir, but you are not the sexy one. Perhaps next time we try with a little stubble, a little more soul in the eyes?

Will Forte ► Ted Dwane

Beard: Perfect. Crazy eyes: Perfect. Will seems like he's perpetually in the process of proving that he can pull off Amish/insane hobo, which is pretty much how we would sum up the entire Mumford aesthetic anyway.

That's how many people watched "Megalodon: The Monster Shark Lives" on the 4.8 MILLION Discovery Channel on Sunday, breaking 26 years of Shark Week viewership records, the network reports. Next question: Are they planning a special on the "Sharknado" effect?

Get Colbert

Stephen Colbert, meet Thomas Bangalter and Guy-Manuel de Homem-Christo. Er, we mean, Daft Punk. The French electrorobot duo will appear on "The Colbert Report" on Tuesday as part of the host's ColbChella series, ew.com reports Potential outcomes: Interview, performance or REMOVAL OF HELMETS! (JK, those things don't come off.)

'Million Second' baby

You know what we really needed in our lives? MORE Ryan Seacrest. The "American Idol"/radio/New Year's Eve/life host picked up a new gig this week as the face behind NBC's *Million Second Quiz," thr.com reports. The show will take place over the course of 12 days and nights (hence the million seconds), and also will involve players living in a giant hourglass in downtown Manhattan, So, basically, Julianne Hough's worst nightmare.

THE QUOTE

There's a little bit of hatred and love all wrapped into one. And I thought that's pretty special."

VMA-list OK, this might actually get us to start watching again, Pitchfork.com reported Monday that Kanve West will perform "Black Skinhead" at the MTV Video Music Awards on Aug. 25, potentially stealing the spotlight from Lady Gaga, who's also set to show up. This performance will tie Madonna's VMAs record at seven each. In other things Madonna and Kanye have in common ..
